Short Description
The establishment of the state of Israel in 1948 marked a crucial development in the formation of the Palestinian identity and history. With the dispersion of the Palestinian population, a small but significant minority continued to reside within the borders of the new state, making up to 20% of its population. This course introduces the history of the Palestinian population through the examination of its dealing with Israel from the First World War to the present. During this period, Israel has grown from a fragile state to a regional power with a resilient economy and strong army, restoring a long-forgotten language and forging a new history. Yet, its relationships with Palestinian citizens remain fraught and worrisome. How did the state of Israel come to deal with a non-Jewish minority in its midst? How did Palestinian citizens cope with the imposition of the new Israel rule and order? Seeking to understand the history of Palestinian citizens, this course aims to elucidate the complexity of the Palestinian-Israeli relations through a greater attention to the major historical events that structured Israeli and Palestinian identities.
